Columbia's First Snow Gets Agreeable Reception.

"Sounds like old times," one farmer said to another as they stood on the corner of Broadway and Ninth street Saturday listening to the jingle of bells and watching the sleighs glide along on the snow that covered the streets.

Everyone immediately took advantage of Columbia's first big snow of the winter. Long double sleds were brought out and hitched to the rear axles of automobiles, and howling parties of students and townspeople rode through the streets until long into the night.

The snow was swept from the lakes, and large parties have been out skating.

Columbia.

Tonight and Tuesday—William S. Hart proves to be an ideal sweetheart, cowboy and governor in his latest Paramount picture, "Three Word Brand," the scenes of which are laid in the far West in the days when pioneer settlers had to back their paths through droves of hostile Indians. Hart plays the roles of pioneer, father, rancher and governor of the state. He is first seen as a settler who, after seeing his twin sons safe from the Indians, blows himself and the savages to pieces to prevent them from trailing his motherless boys. They are rescued, and one becomes the governor of the state while the other turns rancher. How they meet and what follows makes up one of the most interesting stories ever screened.
